STALKING CELEBRITIES

POEMS
BY JAMES PENHA

I trailed Woody Allen up Madison Avenue once.

Block after block, I slowed to his footsteps. He talked with a woman oh twice his height. Not Keaton, nor Mia of course. They parted the waves.

In the wake, I watched millions tilt their eyes and try to watch with casualness

where they went.

Not one broke stride;

we yielded Woody his vector. But at the plane of passage

all turned for the denouement with their heads upon their shoulders and quickly back to each other to ask, rhetorically, "Do you know who that was?"

or to say who that was.

The sure

only smiled.

Others looked back

This city was Woody's.

WOODY ALLEN, ALIVE AND WELL

charlie
the little must
ache
--
querulously
it revs up from attraction to the high light
right eye,
then alternates with the pendulum
of
time
current,
frees the nose to inhale gusts
of great air,
and, truly,
enforces a smirk,
the little man is empowered.

RUDY

Emerging from the parking garage to the November light of 51st Street I needed a Circle in the Square where Ah Wilderness was amidst crowds jaywalking to queues for curtains when I felt a startling thump to my back. It smacked of muggery, spun me round like a revolving door, but spindleless I plummeted down shelves of strangers to the ground on my ass and so saw his horizontal right arm a bulbous bow breaking the ice of pre-theater klatches and the carelessly ignorant gutter bergs, his muffler flying behind on the wind his stride created: Nureyev, head knitted, feet booted for the cold, commanding the theatre district, utterly virtuosic--in a coup de Tatar--rushing deux in fewer than ten minutes. I sat an invisible corps in his life's ballet losing my breath for his buoyancy.

EULOGY AT OPRYLAND

Merle Watson, he done it right:

He didn't plow his veins

with rock 'n' roll

or mill'ris brains

with jazz. That boy jest slid 'ris strings o'er the songs of 'ris pa-

Didn' open 'is mouth,

didn' hog the light.

I 'rays thought

I'd like 't expire here

on this stage

with my fiddle

fallin' on me like a lily.

But Merle was a realer country boy to die wrapped up in the hum of 'is tractor.

DIGGING LORCA

Do soggy bones matter more than Bernarda's broken cane or New York
tenements or a perfect pair of olives in hand? For if we hold, Federico, your delicate fingers, trace the lines of your lips with our fingers, and hear your inspiration even now, we have no need for the palpable
to imagine you.

Exhumation reminds me more of the next innocent
to die wordlessly
in a ditch.
