This morning at the bus-stop pale steam rose from my coffee and spread its wings like a blind white bat fluttering from the mouth of its Styrofoam cave.

Not everything that breaks needs to be repaired or replaced. Lend us a puddle for our rain. Let us borrow another tomorrow, another parade. Another gently lost paddle for the bottom of our lake.